

Rob Peter

—Muhammad Adib Surani

You step out from the air conditioned interior of the Brisbane airport and taste the warm and slightly humid Queensland air. A short but exorbitantly priced taxi ride brings you to the Sofitel. Upon request at the counter, you are met with a well-tanned, but otherwise congruent version of the Goldilocks you saw this morning. After telling him the password, you make arrangements to have a black Aston Martin readied for you by ten and stroll off to catch some shut eye. You decide to take a shower first, however, and find a diary left by a late Mr. Robert Peter tucked away in a bathroom drawer.
